I Linguistic Speech Classification

In applying the search-and-count approach, we first follow procedure often employed in natural language processing, i.e., we first remove stop words (e.g., “and” or “the”) and then create stem words.

We collect all speeches for members of the FOMC from <http://www.federalreserve.gov/newsevents/>. To classify the tone of speeches, we use a “search-and-count” approach as in Apel and Grimaldi (2012). Search-and-classify is an automated method to classify text into categories. The key input into “search-and-count” classification is a pre-specified word list which the research classifies as “hawkish” or “dovish.” Using this pre-specified word list, we can count the hawkish and dovish terms within one speech and aggregate over the document. Following this procedure, we obtain a classification if a speech is on average more hawkish or dovish.

A subtlety arises in applying the approach of Apel and Grimaldi (2012) to our data as they work with Swedish texts. In Swedish, compound words such as “output gap” appear with a blank between the two words. In English many interesting words in our application are compound words, e.g., “labor force participation.” We therefore first use a list of such compound words to create a list of relevant nouns to be paired with an adjective or verb. We then look at all two-grams (contiguous combinations of two words within a document). We require that one word within a two-gram contains either one of our nouns or verbs or adjectives. After this filtering step, we obtain a list of two-grams which we classify into hawkish and dovish. To obtain this classification, we read a large number of speeches to determine in which context these two-grams are typically used. We make the classified two-grams and our initial word list available under http://faculty.chicagobooth.edu/michael.weber/research/data/HD_classification.xlsx and in Table A.1.

Table A.1: Hawk–Dove Classification

This table reports the classification of the twograms we use to classify speeches by FOMC members as dovish or hawkish. Our sample period is from the January 1996 to December 2007.
